

9 Useless Things to Cut From Your Marketing

INTRODUCTION

The fast-paced world of digital marketing -- with all its technological advancements and iterative improvements to our marketing processes -- has theoretically made marketers' lives easier. We have more options, tools, and resources to be better, faster, and stronger.

But the flip side of the coin -- and probably the more realistic manifestation of all these advancements -- is that marketers are overwhelmed. It seems like every week there's something new we absolutely must be doing, lest we get left behind. Problem is, a lot of this new "stuff," is now outdated and an inefficient use of a marketer's time and budget. Or worse, was never a good use of time and budget to begin with.

We'd like 2014 to be the year you clean up your marketing toolkit. What are you wasting time on? What tactics are you needlessly holding on to like a marketing security blanket? What can you eliminate from your budget? This ebook is going to outline what many marketers waste time on that's not going to help you move the needle in 2014 -- so you can eliminate it for good!

#1 THE ON-PAGE SEO FIXATION

Most marketers are really comfortable with optimizing their web content for SEO, because they know it's something well within their control to do. They hit the biggies -- H1, Page Title, Post Title, Image, URL, Content -- with their keywords, and sit pretty thinking they totally nailed their SEO.

Unfortunately, what we're comfortable with isn't always the best use of our time. On-page SEO, while something you should certainly spend a couple minutes checking out before you publish new web content, isn't something marketers should be obsessing over anymore. Google's algorithm is much more sophisticated than it was even a few years ago, so keyword optimization isn't going to cut it anymore.

AND START FOCUSING ON:

-  Keywords
-  Links
-  User Experience
-  Conversions

#2 THE FIREHOSE BLAST OF BLOG CONTENT

Much like the social media bandwagon we've all jumped on, most marketers are convinced they need to be blogging for their business. Of late, some marketers have taken this concept to the extreme, pumping out content at assembly-line pace. More blogging is better blogging, right?

Not necessarily. If you're trying to compensate for low quality with high quantity, you're doing yourself more harm than good -- readers won't regard your content well, and as a result, Google won't hold your domain in high regard, either.

Additionally, if you're resource-strapped, there's a blogging volume sweet spot you can rest comfortably in. 92% of businesses that blog multiple times a day have acquired a customer from it. But 78% of businesses that blog on a daily basis have also acquired a customer from it. That differential isn't too big. And if we bring down the volume just a tad to 2-3 times per week, still, 70% of business acquire a customer from their blog.

AND START FOCUSING ON:

Test the frequency of your blog publishing volume, and uncover the volume you need to hold to maintain the customer acquisition you need from that channel.

#3 YOUR GO-TO MARKETING OFFER

To generate leads, you need a blow-out marketing offer that your site visitors can convert on. But then you need another. And another. And another after that.

After a while, you'll start to realize some offers perform better than others for lead generation, so you start using that offer all of the time. Problem is, that offer can get really over-saturated really fast, and what once yielded your best clickthrough rate will end up being mediocre at best.

CUT THAT GO-TO MARKETING OFFER

AND START FOCUSING ON:

Creating a new offer that'll capture people's attention. Look at historical data to see what topic has performed best for you, and find a way to make it 10 times better.

#4 THOSE MILLIONS OF MICROSITES

To be great at SEO, you need inbound links. But to get inbound links, you need other sites to link to you. That doesn't give you much control. Oh, I know! I'll create my own little websites -- many marketers have come to refer to these as 'microsites' -- and link to my domain from those!

Drop this. First of all, maintaining a bunch of websites takes a ridiculous amount of time and money. I mean, where are you getting all the content to keep them going? Plus, for your inbound links to mean anything, they need to be coming from a wide variety of high quality sites. Unless you plan on creating hundreds of microsites that have a ton of clout with the SERPs, this strategy is a waste of your time.

CUT THOSE MICROSITES

AND START FOCUSING ON:

Attracting organic inbound links. Work on creating content and marketing people love. Do that, and you'll see the right kind of linking -- the inbound kind.

#5 ALL THAT OVER-REPORTING

We're the last ones to say you shouldn't be reporting on your marketing, but with the Big Data explosion has also come a whole lot of time wasted interpreting numbers and analytics that don't really mean anything for you right now.

It's easy to spend an entire day just diving into, say, conversion reports, but what is all that information getting you? A lot of spreadsheets and numbers does not make a marketing strategy. Figure out exactly what numbers you need to know for your business' marketing, and do deeper dives into specific metrics as needed. It's a better use of your time, and frankly provides more actionable advice than running hours of reports at the end of each month that you never use.

CUT OVER-REPORTING

AND START FOCUSING ON:

The metrics you need to succeed. Analyze where your business has performed well, and where it has potential. Start focusing on these areas.

#6 YOUR UNTARGETED PAID MEDIA SPEND

2013 saw a ton of advancements in paid advertising targeting options. For instance, did you know that Twitter paid advertising now allows marketers to target their audience by interest or username? Did you know that Facebook paid advertising now lets marketers target their audience by desktop or mobile? If you're investing in PPC in any capacity and using targeting like this, congratulations, you're doing it right.

If, however, you're dumping money into completely untargeted PPC, it's kind of like emailing your entire contacts database without doing any segmentation. Turn off your paid media spend that isn't leveraging targeting functionality, otherwise you're throwing your marketing budget right out the window.

CUT UNTARGETED PPC SPEND

AND START FOCUSING ON:

Targeting your PPC campaigns to people you want to reach. Even if that overall volume is lower, the conversion will be higher.

#7 THAT MOBILE APP YOU'RE DEVELOPING

You unequivocally should be investing in mobile marketing. Investing in mobile application development, however, is a distraction and resource sap for most marketers.

There are well over one million mobile apps on the market, and they're being released at rapidly increasing rates -- not to mention 25% of apps are downloaded only once, and never used again after their initial download. With a cluttered market and stickiness challenge, unless your mobile app is going to drive some serious results for your business, reroute your efforts to something that will give you a bigger bang for your buck.

CUT THAT MOBILE APP PROGRESS

AND START FOCUSING ON:

Optimizing your entire web presence for mobile. The negative impact from having an unfriendly mobile presence will be far greater than the success of a mobile app.

#8 YOUR UNNECESSARY WEBSITE REDESIGN

Full-fledged website redesigns start out sounding like a great idea, and end up being a massive headache -- typically pulling in more people than you thought would be involved, spending more money than you budgeted, and often adversely impacting conversion rates.

It's not that you positively do not need a website redesign in 2013 -- you very well may -- but before you overhaul what you've got, ask yourself if you can work in smaller chunks. Consider a series of A/B tests in which you incrementally improve upon parts of your website, and apply your learnings on a wider scale once they're statistically significant. And if you do learn that a bigger redesign is needed, assess whether you have the in-house resources required to pull it off without derailing all your other initiatives. If you don't, for your sake and your marketing's, outsource it to a vetted professional.

#9 THOSE SOCIAL NETWORKS NO ONE USES

Do you remember around 2007 when a small handful of marketers started using social media as a marketing channel? Do you remember how almost everyone in the industry thought it was either 1) ridiculous, or 2) not applicable to their business or industry?

Fast forward to today, and most marketers are really scared of being the equivalent of the one who said “Facebook is dumb” back in 2007. As a result, there’s a whole lot of time wasted on social networks that, frankly, don’t really work for you. But you keep using them out of fear of getting left behind.

If the social networks you’re using aren’t working, now is the time to stop using them. For example, if you gave Pinterest the old college try, and it simply is not driving any meaningful business results for you, let it go. Just make sure you’re making your decision based on analytics, not gut feelings.

CUT UNUSED SOCIAL NETWORKS

AND START FOCUSING ON:

Optimizing the social media channels that are driving success for your business. It's okay to admit that a particular network doesn't work for you.

CONCLUSION

There's no time like the present to take a look at your marketing activities and figure out what's working, and what isn't. And if you're setting aggressive marketing goals for yourself, cutting some of the time-wasters and ineffective tactics mentioned in this ebook will give you the bandwidth you need to pursue those new strategies.

Whatever it is you're resolving to do with your marketing strategy next year, make sure you resolve one extra thing: To constantly evaluate whether your activities are moving the needle. It's always a good idea to experiment with something new -- as long as you know when to say "when" with the latest and greatest. This kind of self-analysis will keep you running an agile, up-to-date, and efficient marketing machine!
